Actually, it's a funny story: a little handbook came along with my vagina, which laid out all the tenets of feminism to me at a young age. Did you not read yours?

Oh, you got the goofy one. No wonder you're confused! Mine was pretty straightforward, and basically said that people shouldn't rape each other and that men shouldn't act like assholes to women and vice versa, and so on. But I did hear there was a publication error that got some women awfully mixed-up... I think your edition instructs you to obsessively repeatedly link to random YouTube videos? That's a doozy of a typo.

Well, I don't really believe there's such a thing as a "White Knight" but I understand the phrase to mean a guy who is sucking up to women in an effort to get laid. I just think you're not so desperate as to want to sleep with MRAs (you're welcome!), so hopefully that's not your reason for this odd mentality you've got on display here.

Then yes, I do think that oppression runs along multiple axes, including race and nationality and socioeconomic status, and that gender interacts dynamically with all of these other factors to create a sort-of meshwork of oppression (you might be familiar with the term kyriarchy) along which people can be found to relate to each other down gradients of power. Saying that "men mostly oppress women" or whatever does little to address this more complex model of human interaction, which is actually something that feminism has been working on quite a bit (with varied success) and which I might posit remains our current greatest weakness as well as our greatest opportunity to really flesh-out and develop our strategies and effect some proper change.

His analysis erased female victims. For starters, the 1-in-5 figure represented sexual assault, not rape. He blithely removed all the sexual assaults and dismissed them as "boob grabs". Then he went on to exclude the 57% of students who didn't participate in the survey. That's blatantly dishonest.

Wrong! You said, "I actually can't think of any Men's Rights activists who've erased

And? What feminists? I don't give a shiite what other people think, or say. Feminism isn't a movement of organizations. I don't personally have to care about a group of people and go by their wishes or their directives or follow their every word in order to be a feminist . Your bringing one woman up, over and over again as some sort of example of how feminists think, is repetitive and meaningless. Get some new material, please.

On the topic of the thread, I'd say that the specific example of the article isn't conducive to discussing any issues, it was chosen to mock and shame - to, if at all possible - permanently preempt and preclude discussion.

It reminds me of slut-shaming on the right. You're a sucker to debate this on all counts - debating under this article, debating this crowd, debating this way...
