Knightrunner said that men would need to record all sexual encounters to avoid false rape charges on an article that talked about the way that some MRAs have respond to learning about a woman accusing a man of raping her.

If Knightrunner wasn't trying to imply that this woman's accusation is false, then why did he decide to make a comment about false accusations at all?

Let's say that I read an article about how people had responded to a male victim of spousal abuse by accusing him of either making it up or blaming him for his wife's behavior, and decided to leave a comment which said "Lmao. The best way to avoid being falsely accused of abusing men is to video tape every encounter with them. Men if you don't like this then help us make the world a safer place for ladies to interact with you. Until then prepare to be video-taped for our security. You can thank MRAs for this." Would you have a problem with this? Or would you be totally cool with it, even though it implies that many male victims of domestic violence aren't really victims at all?

The police have dropped charges.

So what? If a man accuses a woman of abusing him and the police drop the charges against her, does that mean that it's fair for us to instantly assume that he was lying?

At what point is innocence assumed by you people?

If I were on a jury, then I'd start out by presuming Lanning's innocence. However, I am not on a jury. "Innocent until proven guilty" is a legal standard used to determine whether or not someone should be punished for a crime. It is not a standard for determining whether we personally think that someone likely did something wrong. If my best friend tells me that another person stole a hundred dollars from him, I don't automatically assume that he's a liar simply because he hasn't managed to absolutely prove that the accused is a thief.

Well, in Schumer's case, you'll be surprised to find that it actually wasn't rape. In fact, in Schumer's actual story, she actually didn't instigate anything. She was literally pushed onto the bed, while her partner did everything else. Amy literally just laid there until it was over.

In fact, one could make the argument that it was actually her partner who raped her. However, Amy herself has gone on to say that it was just a regretful sexual encounter on her part.

Rape is when someone forces sex onto an unconsenting person. The guy in Schumer's story initiating sex. If he was aware enough of his surroundings to initiate sex, then he was aware enough to consent. Schumer was passive throughout most of their encounter. You cannot commit rape by simply sitting there passively while someone else has sex with you.

Actually, this article doesn't do any of that. It presents the case in a very "matter of fact" way. The case is still on going, and nobody has been charged with anything. What this article does go into however was how a large enough group of individuals who claimed they were MRA used this article as an excuse to go into "how to have consequence free sex with drunk women".

And as for the sociopolitical differences of "The Red Pill" and the "MRA", I do release that although two groups do overlap with each other on a lot of subjects regarding feminism (many in fact do identify as both), "Red Pill" fellows do tend to think that MRA's "Whine and complain too much" ((PUA's tend to think that way too, but again, I could be wrong)).

Most feminists distinguish between people who are drunk but can still consent and people who are so drunk that they cannot consent. In saying that the woman who has accused Lanning of sexual assault and could not clearly remember what had happened to her, it implies that she was so drunk that she was too drunk to consent.

I find it funny that you are accusing me of defending Schumer just because she's a woman, given that I had to explain that a woman who has sex with a man who is to drunk to consent is a rapist to another person in the comments here.

If you initiate sex with someone and then fall asleep on top of them, then you haven't been raped.

The problem is that far too many people think that just because drunk people who are aware of what's going on around them can provide consent, then that means that it is perfectly acceptable to get someone so intoxicated that they are no longer aware of their surroundings and rape them. The latter is what Lanning's victim has accused him of doing.

Well, it's just with all your talking of "women taking responsibility for their own actions." Yet you're more than willing to claim that Amy was "bullying" her partner, thus trying to absolve her partner of any of the responsibility.

I mean, if that's your creed, then shouldn't the reverse also be applied? That being, "Men should be responsible of their own actions."?

Oh now, they both dislike you and don't believe in the "suffering man" narrative. They just dislike you for slightly different reasons. You see, the PUA's don't have that nihilistic angle that the Red Pillers have. So while the PUA's might most likely that, "You guys are a bunch of chumps that don't know how to play the game.", Red Pillers dislike you because they believe, "You guys are fighting a useless battle for Western Civilization that's doomed anyways."

Oh, but trust me, all three of you are dumb in your own special, unique way, and all of you seem to have a common enemy in feminism.

I did a google search trying to find a specific paper i believe written by Kim Pate about why she was supporting Homolkas release, but all i can find is her BS about redistributive justice. From my memory the paper was not much better, mostly a rant about how she was being criminalized by our awful society.

Snipits about them are not uncommon however. They supported her early release but did revoke revoke that when they came under heavy media blowback:

<http://www.cbc.ca/news/canada/...>

They have frequently gone to bat for her when the media criticized her fancy dress parties and tulip gardening h obbies:< br /><http://www.cbc.ca/news/canada/...>

and the previously mentioned quote by Alias shows their general philosophy on her, That she deserves little to no punishment for her crimes.

I will however inform you if i find something more damning, I understand "C.O.C.K" is also taking an interest in this.

What we have here is an internecine socialist fight between you MRA socialists and the feminist socialists that has little to nothing to do with us regular people (kind of like the Leninists fighting the Marxists back in the day).

Us normal people think that neither drunk men nor drunk women can consent. Period.

I didn't say that.

YOU said "" 'telling women there are steps to take that can protect them from becoming crime victims including the crime of rape' = 'saying that women want to be raped due to psychological problems' "" in your comment.

You're flat wrong.
